The General Anthroposophical Society

The importance of the General Anthroposophical Society for the development of humanity is still largely underestimated today, even at the heart of the anthroposophical community.

Rudolf Steiner created the forms of this new model society out of the flames of the fire of the 1st Goetheanum and its traces written in the cosmic ether. Built on a foundation stone laid in the hearts of the members, it was anchored in today's civilisation by way of the statutes that were discussed and completed in the course of week-long exchanges with the members and representatives of the newly created national societies.

In this way, in the sphere of rights and in the actuality of our time, the Anthroposophical Society incarnates as a seed for humanity, the model of a legal persona whose potential and essential meaning remain to be discovered.

The Society is the social body that calls on us to order our karma, to act with initiative, to place before the world what it lives in our hearts to do, and so to feel the divine-spiritual working alongside us. That is why our relation to the Anthroposophical Society cannot be neutral: love, refuse or ignore it, one has an existential link to it.

In this conference we want to try and come close to this reality, to live it through others and to discover it in ourselves.
